Date Night Ideas

"Date nights, however, shouldn't be haphazard occurrences that happen only when opportunity, finance, and laundry all reach some perfect and magical alignment in the universe.

Date nights are planned. Date nights are prioritized"

Dr John M. Gottman, Eight Dates: A Plan for Making Love Last Forever

Research shows that date nights - that is, carving out time with your partner to leave your work life and work-in-the-home life to one side and focus on being together - helps foster communication, love and intimacy in relationships resulting in stronger and longer marriages and connections. As Drs Julie and John Gottman say 'The plain and simple truth is date nights make relationships.'

But how to find the time? And what about the expense? Babysitters, taxis, restaurants, or even the current quarantine restrictions make it tough to even begin to think about date night. You can start by agreeing with your partner how you can prioritise date nights together whilst staying within your earthly bounds.

In fact, the following pages of these Date Night at Home Ideas are designed to help you get creative when planning your date nights (or date mornings / date afternoons - you get the idea).

Print or capture the ideas you like the sound of most and add your own suggestions or ideas in the notes sections. Sometimes it's helpful to use these as wallpaper on your phone, to hang on the fridge or put somewhere specific to remind you of the importance and priority. Maybe you can even leave a page in the letterbox as a date invitation to your loved one?

Don't forget to define what date night is for you. Date night should not be watching Netflix together (date night should never involve separately scrolling through social media). Date nights give you time to really focus on, talk with, and listen to each other.
